

I can't imagine why the FCC would consider weakening the "Do Not Call" law, even though NJ's law may be less strict than the federal law. By and large, telemarketers abuse their right to sell by calling at the most inopportune times, as well as times that are downright not business hours, such as Sundays, and late, late evenings. Before I signed up to the list, I was receiving calls as late as 10pm. That is unacceptable. Telemarketers need to respect the fact that people are not interested in making those types of purchases and often associate negativity toward their business simply because of an annoying telemarketing call. Telemarketers should be happy that the federal law isn't as strict as NJ's law, leaving plenty of other states they can continue to harass.
